Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom of man from time immemorial to pay tribute to the dead. In pursuance of that time-honored custom we have assembled here to-day to pay tribute to that distinguished and illustrious son of Alabama, the late Senator JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD. He lived a long and useful life; rendered valuable service to the Confederacy in the Civil War; succeeded in the business world; and then, later, served many terms in the House, where he rendered valuable service to his State in the opening of the Warrior River to navigation. Later the people of our State honored him again by electing him to the United States Senate. As the honored successor to John T. Morgan, he wore with distinction the senatorial toga, and during his entire service in the Senate his integrity, loyalty, and statesmanship were never questioned. One of his greatest achievements is the Bankhead Highway, a national asset. While I did not know the Senator intimately, except for the brief period I was with him in Washington, yet having known of him for practically all of my life I feel that I am well acquainted with his character, work, and life, and therefore can speak truly of him. It has ever been the custom, Mr. Speaker, on occasions like this, to extol the virtues and praise the life, works, and character of the deceased. Perhaps the generosity of mankind in this regard is not altogether amiss, since we may draw lessons, in this solemn hour, of benefit to the living. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that neither words, high-sounding phrases, nor flights of oratory lend color to his character nor magnify his greatness. In this instance the naked truth suffices, and gives a real charm and a lasting glory to his name. Senator JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD needs no encomium from me. His long life of service to his country stands as an enduring monument, and nothing that I may say will add to or detract from the greatness of this splendid man. He belonged to the old school—that type of statesmanship fast passing away; strong, rugged, plain, honest, faithful to every duty, and incorruptible in his character. In the days of Julius Caesar he would have graced the Roman forum. A man of far-seeing vision, dependable and courageous, possessed of a brilliant intellect, not of that meteoric type which illumines the heavens for a brief period and dies, but of that constant, serene type, as a planet giving out its enduring and fervid rays which light the mariner in his course and beams steadily upon the shepherd and his flock. Alabama and her people will ever gratefully remember the honored name, and there will ever live in the hearts of her people the memory of JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 20, 1921.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, from Savannah, Mo., to the Capitol at Washington and back is a long journey, and one that the Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER made during every Congress, beginning with the Sixtieth and including the Sixty-sixth. At each end he had a host of friends made by his kindly nature and held by his high character.

For 14 long years, through some of the most momentous days of the Republic, he represented here six counties of the great State of Missouri, including its third city—St. Joseph. This he did so well that opposition had almost ceased to think of challenging his seat. In these halls he was respected as an intelligent, industrious, and honorable man, a capable representative of those who delegated their powers to him. In the little city of Savannah every citizen held out to him a kindly hand whenever he came home.

Congressman BOOHER's district was just across the river from the one I represent in the State of Kansas. You can stand at Quindaro and look up and across the river to the hills of Missouri, where Parkville grows up about Park College, with that mighty river rolling between. For 60 years those States, differing in political views, have lived to see the time when the best of friendships were maintained between them, and one of the first I was to meet here was my neighbor, the gentleman from the fourth Missouri district. His interests and mine in the success of Missouri River projects were the same, and made the basis of an acquaintance and friendship which brings me here to express the sentiments of admiration and respect I retain for him whose memory shall remain with me.

As one of the funeral cortege I went to Savannah and heard the eulogies delivered there in the beautiful little church to which the neighbors came from far and wide when the Hon. CHARLES F. BOOHER was laid away in the little cemetery to be for many years to come, the most distinguished citizen perhaps of Savannah. That that little city should furnish the Congressman for that great district so long was due to the sterling work and courteous kindness of Mr. BOOHER—a typical American citizen. The House of Representatives is made by the Constitution the representative body. The Senate, to which come as many from Rhode Island as from New York, was intended by the Constitution to be a great deliberative body where experienced men shall take the last look at the legislation which governs the Nation and dominates the course of its life. But in a body like this where a hundred million people are represented, the number of those who are absolutely necessary to represent the people is such that it can not be as deliberative a body as the Senate. The men who actually represent 100,000,000 other people must be so numerous as to require a limitation on debate, but the Constitution puts here the sole actual representation the people are receiving, and to attempt to limit it would be an infringement on the rights of the people as announced in that great document.

These men, therefore, are those who reflect here the wishes of the people, and they are of the people as was Mr. BOOHER, and this was the secret of his success. He was one of those men who represent the average American sentiment with sound common sense and stable integrity. Such men are always useful everywhere as he was here, and especially on that great Rivers and Harbors Committee where he served so long. The delegation which accompanied his remains to their last resting place carried with them to that graveside the certificate that he who after 14 years in the Congress of the United States had completed an unsullied and an honored career was entitled to have written upon his final papers that his services in this great body were always honest and faithful.

His seat here is vacant, and he will be seen no more. But the spring is here and soon the spring flowers will bloom above his honored grave and fill the air there with a fragrance as sweet and gentle as the memory of this honest, sensible, and gentle man, which will linger with all of us as long as any of those who learned to know and love him remain in this House.

HON. L. B. RAINEY,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 20, 1921.

Mr. RAINEY of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, in memoriam of FRED L. BLACKMON, my departed friend, I wish to speak of his life, his character, his virtues, and then to lay tenderly upon his bier a wreath of flowers to his memory—a tribute to this good, manly, and kind-hearted man. At his funeral service, in his home town of Anniston, Ala., and in his own home, I looked for the last time upon the well-remembered features of FRED BLACKMON. I saw an embankment of flowers bestowed by admiring friends, fraternal orders, and organizations. I heard one of the most eloquent sermons fall from the lips of man, delivered by Dr. Frank Brandon, my former pastor. I saw his family, relatives, and friends stricken in sorrow and bereavement, and then at the conclusion of the service I saw men from all the walks of life—the low and the high, the rich and the poor—file by the casket and gaze for the last time upon the calm face. I saw a man of talent and of genius pause—one of Alabama's most gifted sons—and the tears trickled down his cheeks, and then I saw the old, hardy son of toil from the mountains, his long gray beard like the prophet's of old, look upon his face, and heard him exclaim, "FRED was always my friend."

Mr. Speaker, these incidents proclaim the man. He was a child of nature. He loved his fellow men, and they loved him and were proud of him. Time in his relentless course cuts down all alike. He spares neither the rich nor the poor, the low nor the high, the weak nor the strong, the mediocre nor the man of genius. Naught can defy him, for in his onward course he has leveled mountains with the plains, changed the course of mighty rivers, and altered the basins of the seas. The stars, the planets, and all that encompass heaven's cosmos have bowed to the mandates of time. We mortals must follow nature's course, and yet, though the body is cold in death, his actions and influence shall live. His memory shall be perpetuated not only in marble and upon the records of his Nation but in the hearts and memory of living men. The date and place of birth, childhood, and young manhood of the deceased have already been gone into in the remarks of his bosom friend, Mr. DENT, and therefore I shall speak of him from the time I first knew him, which was about 1907. At that time Mr. BLACKMON was the junior member of one of the big law firms of Alabama—Knox, Acker & Blackmon. He handled many cases for his firm in my home town, Gadsden, Ala. In the trial of these cases he attracted the attention of the local bar and gave evidences of the qualifications which later developed him into one of the leading trial lawyers of our State. He knew men, and he knew human nature. This trait or gift, together with his ability in presenting his case, made him a power before the jury.

As a practitioner he was a success, and later in life, when he entered the political arena, these same qualifications insured to him political success. As a man, a lawyer, and a politician he enjoyed great popularity. Familiarly known as "Fred," he was esteemed a loyal and true friend, firm in his convictions and known never to swerve from any stand he had taken so long as he believed he was right. In the House he voted his convictions fearlessly and regardless of consequences. Some men are politicians and vote public sentiment. In this sense Mr. BLACKMON was not a politician but always voted as he believed. He was not one of those who are moved by public opinion, fads, or sentiment. In the great battle of life he won, and thousands in his district remember him as their ardent friend. As a husband and father he was affectionate, tender, and ever mindful of the slightest wish of wife or children. To know him was to love him, and his friends were bound to him "with hoops of steel." Life at best is one great struggle, and that character so strong and ennobling which not only achieves success but blesses all with kindness and consideration with whom it comes in contact is rare indeed; but such was the character of FRED L. BLACKMON. With the great lens of life he concentrated the sunbeams of happiness, good cheer, kindness, and good fellowship into many a dismal and benighted heart and caused to spring therein new hope and new aspirations. His personality was grand and the influence of that personality gave confidence and courage. While yet in the prime of manhood and usefulness the Grim Reaper summoned him to answer death's call. He answered that call as he had lived—courageously and fearlessly. Farewell, my good friend, forever. You have gone the way all of us must soon follow. May your memory live green always in the hearts of your friends and may the influence of your good deeds live hereafter.
